Newtown Goes Electric

- Compiled by Brian Rounsavill -

While working on a forthcoming book project, some intriguing photos were uncovered in a box of old glass negatives on loan from a local resident. The badly deteriorated glass plates were mixed in with some “Worstall Brothers” images, including one image of the current Newtown Beverage Company building where the old Worstall Mill once operated.

At first glance, the images appeared to be of a large factory or industrial complex most likely in another city such as Philadelphia. Even though we focused initially on the photos we could easily identify, the badly deteriorated images of the factory became more and more intriguing. There are two views of a large factory and one close-up view of workers building a large pole and pulley system. The simple notation that they were labeled “Worstall Brothers” seemed to capture our curiosity but the sheer size of the industrial complex in the photos seemed too out of place for such a rural agricultural community like Newtown was at the turn of the century. Following this notion, and after much research, we determined that these images are in fact the only known photos of the Newtown Electric Light and Power Company.

The Newtown Electric Light and Power Company was officially incorporated on May 16, 1899; however, construction on the site began several years earlier in the summer of 1893, as shown in the old glass plates. Ground was purchased from the Worstall Brothers on south Lincoln Avenue, opposite the old Railroad Station. Garret B. Girton began excavation for the foundation walls in July 1893. Here a plant was erected, and light and power furnished to the public.

Construction moved rather quickly, but not without issue. In August, while raising the frame work on the electric light building, the stay of one of the heavy guy ropes pulled out, knocking out one side of the brick wall and heavy rains later toppled an interior cross wall. However, by September, the steam boiler for the engine of the electric light plant was put into position and workmen began digging holes and setting poles about town for the lamps and wires of the electric light. During this process, many shade trees were trimmed and gas lamps relocated. The plant was “well equipped with all modern improvements and of sufficient size for large increase of business. The building was of brick, neatly finished on inside and provided with office and store rooms, and heated throughout with steam, and well lighted with electric lights. The railroad siding, with large coal bins, was also completed.”

In October, “the monster engine driving the electric light dynamo was given a trial test and performed satisfactorily,” marking an epoch in Newtown’s progressive history by exhibiting the first permanent electric light. That first light “hung from the switchboard in the interior of the building and was pronounced “O.K.” by those who witnessed its brilliancy. Attachments were then made at the George School and an exhibition was given in the streets of Newtown for all to witness.” By the end of November, the 60 foot tall smoke stack was raised into position, along with the new 150-horse power engine that would run the generator.

In order to fully test the system, the electrical contractors and a number of the committee and representatives of the George School “gave the light a thorough test by suddenly throwing on and off hundreds of lights, and were unanimous in the praise of the light and working of the plant. At the plant the test was hardly noticeable, as the machinery is so near automatic in regulation. The plant is now running regular, the school being about the only customer, but the Superintendent informs us that they already have a large number of applicants for lighting, just as soon as the wiring can be done.”

The first residence in Newtown to be illuminated by electric lights was said to have been that of Mrs. Kate S. Wylie at 111 North Chancellor Street. Preparations were soon thereafter made for the installation of lights in the Presbyterian and Episcopalian chapels in Newtown. Mrs. Wylie lived in what was later the Episcopal Rectory. In order to expand business, the Newtown Electric Light and Power Company decided “to offer for a limited time to all future patrons, the necessary labor and material for wiring, at wholesale rates, which made the cost of wiring comparatively very light.” The rates for current were established and as a newspaper article announced, “any information in regard to wiring will cheerfully given by addressing the Superintendent.”

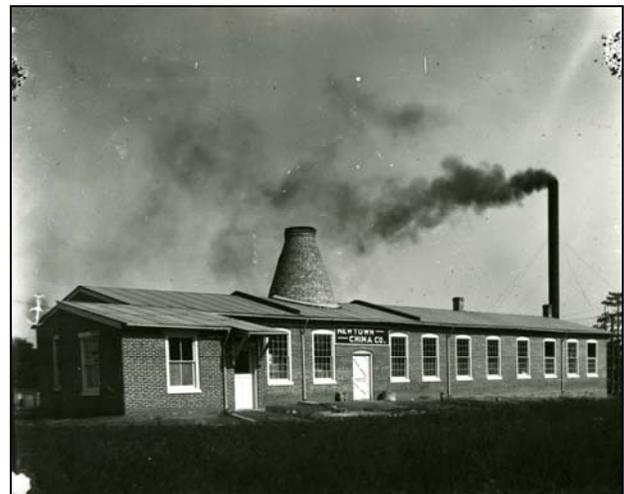

Electricity was supplied to the Trolley Company to run cars from Newtown to the “cut off” railroad at Langhorne, and also furnished to the George School, until their present plant was installed in 1903. The first Officers of the Company were: Ashbel W. Watson, President; Paul Blaker, Treasurer; and George C. Worstall, Secretary.

Newtown Electric Light and Power Company merged with twenty other companies covering the central and southeast portions of Bucks County in 1913, officially forming a new company called Bucks County Electric Company. In 1916, this company merged with Doylestown Electric Company, forming a new company called the Pennsylvania-New Jersey Power and Light Company, which later became the Philadelphia Suburban Gas and Electric Company in 1923 and eventually formed the Philadelphia Electric Company by 1929.

The degradation of the old glass plates leaves a visible shroud of mystery and intrigue on one of the most significant milestones in Newtown’s modern era, the birth of a new industry and the foremost modern improvement of the day. We are fortunate to have recently uncovered and identified these images, as there is scarcely a trace of the expansive electric factory left today, only a green substation tucked in among some trees situated on roughly the same spot where the large generators once whirred and the towering smoke stack once billowed. Unfortunately, not much is known about when the plant officially ceased or what happened to the buildings.

As you turn on your lights or other electric appliances, take a moment to remember just how exciting life must have been a little over one century ago when electricity made its first spark in Newtown from this location on South Lincoln Avenue.
